In San Juan County, voters were determining whether to begin the process of exploring a change in form of government. It comes after a federal judge ordered a special election last year after finding racial gerrymandering in commission and school board boundaries to disadvantage Native American voters. That led to a Navajo-majority commission.

The ACLU of Utah was monitoring the San Juan County elections as part of a settlement over another issue of Navajo voters not having language assistance with ballots and few polling places across the county.

"With that settlement agreement, we are monitoring the polling locations to make sure that what should be in place, is in place," ACLU of Utah staff attorney Leah Farrell told FOX 13.
